Most Memorable Experiences:

It has been an honor to serve you in an unprecedented second presidential term, one defined by purpose and preparation for what comes next. The greatest contribution I could make this year was working alongside ASRT President-elect Marissa Mangrum as she prepares to lead, because mentoring future leaders is how our profession sustains its strength. I am confident she recognizes the profound impact she will have—not only as president, but as a mentor who shapes people and culture. Her vision, discipline, and leadership plan reflect the future we need and deserve. Continuing to collaborate with Dr. Melissa B. Pergola has been equally monumental, reinforcing the power of experience guiding emerging leadership. This year marked a deliberate shift toward investing in the next century of our profession, not just preserving the last. Legacy is not what we leave behind, but who we prepare to lead forward. I leave this role confident, because we are a premier profession of exceptional talent and notable contributors.

Closing Remarks:

As my final presidential message, I begin with sincere gratitude for the trust you placed in me and for the work you do every day to advance our profession. Leadership is not defined by titles, popularity, or proximity to the “in-crowd,” but by the courage to act, adapt and serve with integrity. We must consciously opt out of indecision that keeps us busy but ineffective, and instead commit to work that produces real, visible progress. Our future also depends on flexibility, the willingness to evolve beyond what feels familiar, so we can build new pathways and value for those who follow us. Above all, sincerity must guide us, because trust and impact are lost when ego replaces purpose. Doing the important work matters more than appearing important, and recognition should follow service, not drive it. Healthy disagreement strengthens teams, but self-interest weakens our shared mission. It has been an honor to serve you, and I remain deeply confident in the collective power of this community to move our profession forward together.
